

NURSING AND HEALTH

*H*uman population suffers from the omissions in the field of assistance, at various levels of health care, despite the current political, social and technological advances, whether global or national. Therefore, we believe that the speech of those who occupy places that allow raising the representative voice of the professionals who form the health team, need greater strength so that transformations happen in practice.

Thus, we emphasize that the services provided by nurses appear as important to achieve better results for human health⁽¹⁾. Therefore, their involvement in health systems become relevant and indispensable, since this health is very deteriorated by the multifactorial causes that worsen it and affect life from conception.

Data shows the amount of children born malformed, premature, those who acquire cancer; women who cannot terminate a risk pregnancy; victims of traffic accidents and other forms of violence, such as psychological, physical or sexual; individuals with chronic diseases, like diabetes and hypertension that increase the levels of morbid states, especially of the elderly; the increasing drug use, especially in adolescence, destabilizing families, among others. Therefore, the nurse should be active in health promotion and disease prevention, using health technology, communication and daily devotion. Moreover, their actions must be guided by scientific knowledge; in updating the knowledge; in multidisciplinary; in the integration with the most diverse fields of politics and managerial aspects of health regarding the citizenship and welfare of the client.

Ph.D. Professor Maria Vera Lúcia Moreira Leitão Cardoso
President of the Editorial Board of Rene Journal

References

1. World Health Organization (WHO). Strategic directions for strengthening nursing and midwifery services 2011-2015 [Internet]. Geneva, Switzerland; 2010 [cited 2011 December 03]. Available from: http://www.who.int/hrh/nursing_midwifery/en/